The Power of People

The goal of community development is to help people help themselves!

Join us for an informative and inspiring lecture to explore the process of how a community builds economic development by first developing its people. Free and open to the public.

Presenter Dr. Vaughn Grisham hosts leadership and community development programs at the Mississippi-based McLean Institute for Community Development, which has assisted more than 500 communities energize people and economies. He was Scholar in Residence with the Southern Growth Policies Board, a think-tank that advises governors on economic policies. Grisham co-developed the Tupelo Model of Community Development, which advocates building economically viable communities through development of their people – helping people help themselves.

Other Tupelo guiding principles include:
- Local people must address local problems.
- Each person in the community should be treated as a resource.
- Development cannot be achieved without organizations and structure.
