What does the future of Forestry look like?

New Interim Director takes the helm of Southwestern’s Small Business Development Center

It all started with a love for Greek food. That’s how Ruthie Painter found her way into the restaurant world and a lifelong career as a business owner, entrepreneur, and mentor. Now she’s bringing that expertise to Southwestern’s Small Business Development Center (SBDC) as the new director. When Ruthie Painter opened The Greek Isle, she was one of the original tenants of the 5th Street Public Market in Eugene. All she had were some great recipes and a burning desire to see the business succeed. And it did! The Greek Isle became one of the most popular restaurants in the market’s food court.

After selling the restaurant, and a brief move to Hawaii, Painter and her husband landed in Ashland where she quickly took up with Southern Oregon University (SOU) and became an advisor for the SBDC associated with SOU. While there she developed course work, advised small business owners, and facilitated “Peer to Peer” mentor groups. She did this for over 13 years in the Ashland/Medford area, working with Rogue Community College, as well.

Eight years ago, they moved to Bandon and she began her association with Southwestern’s SBDC and Arlene Soto, the director at the time. For the last three years Painter has been commuting to Southwestern’s campus in Brookings to work with business owners in Curry county. “I worked with some incredible clients in Curry,” says Painter. One sprang to mind because it challenged her normal way of working with people. “This particular client just needed me to work in a different way than what I was used to. I had to adapt, change, and keep convincing him along the way that he could do this.” The result was one of the most innovative business plans she’d ever helped develop.

Painter’s background in start-up, expansion, and leasing practices has served her clients well. “I’m good at systems. I can analyze an existing system, break it down, and rebuilt it so it’s better. I love people, I love collaboration, and I love building collaborative teams!”

Interested in tapping into this great resource called Ruthie Painter? Make an appointment to meet with her (face-to-face or over Zoom) or join the Small Business Management course now in progress.

Southwestern Oregon Community College • Winter Term 2022
‘If you dream it, you can achieve it’
Forest industry wants trained professionals

Quinn Allen

Why not do something you love and make a career out of it? Quinn Allen asked herself that question a couple years ago. She was doing fine with a 15-year career in the restaurant industry, but she was ready to try something new. Why not, right?

“I've always had a huge love for forests. I was born and raised in Oregon and I'm very proud of our forests,” she said.

Quinn lives in Port Orford, and thought about going to community college. She flipped through SWOCC’s certificate and degree options. A forestry certificate looked good. She leaped forward, knowing she could complete entry-level training in one year and keep working full-time.

Hands-on experience
At a small college, there are many opportunities to learn and get involved. Quinn took advantage of an internship with forestry instructor Tasha Livingstone to develop brochures for SWOCC’s forestry programs. She met with students considering the forestry program and made a presentation to eighth-graders. All the while, Tasha forwarded opportunities for internships and job shadowing to help Quinn succeed.

“Tasha was amazing. She did a great job adapting and rising to the challenge of what COVID presented,” Quinn said. “She was always there answering questions.”

Job connections
Most forestry companies want students with a four-year degree, but not everyone starts there. A networker, Quinn became involved in the Coos County Chapter for Oregon Women in Timber. She graduated in June and got a seasonal job with the Coquille Watershed Association as a weed technician.

While doing that work, she took a webinar and learned about Sudden Oak Death, a pathogen killing trees and bushes in Curry County. She got to talking with Oregon State University Extension Service staff, and mentioned there is nothing on social media about the problem. It was not long before Quinn was producing content for Extension staff to post to social media and creating an info-graphic on the issue for landowners.

About that networking? Through SWOCC, Quinn connected with Pro Forestry Consulting in Coos Bay and landed a job. She soon will be training to become a timber cruiser, her dream all along.

“I'm so much happier outside in the field, in the forest,” she said.

Quinn, who always seems to be smiling, takes that happiness home to her 6-year-old son, who “gets to see Mom happy.”

These days, she comes home from work tired, a good tired. She plans to stay involved with Oregon Women in Timber. And, this year she returned to one of SWOCC’s forestry classes as a guest speaker to encourage others to stay on the path to their careers in forestry.

“The forest industry does really need more people in it, up and coming people,” Quinn said.

Innovating
Southwestern has pledged to provide exceptional teaching and engaging space. Delivering on that promise, this fall we opened the new $25 million Umpqua Hall. Walk into our top-notch health and science labs, and you’ll see busy students. Engaged students. Diverse people experimenting and learning together.

We aren’t stopping there. We soon will transform our former lab buildings – Coaledo and Sumner Halls – giving them new life for decades to come. The college will invest $5.5 million to renovate for a new cybersecurity area and updated dental assisting lab. We’ll have new classrooms for fire science and criminal justice.

Our forestry and natural resources program will have a new home -- and more. With support of a Mogan Foundation grant, we are hiring new faculty to expand our teaching and explore opportunities to evolve our curriculum and increase partnerships with industry and university partners.

World class education? We are making it happen at Southwestern.
